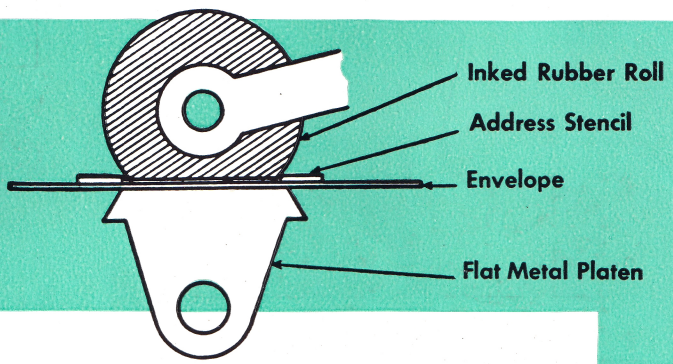
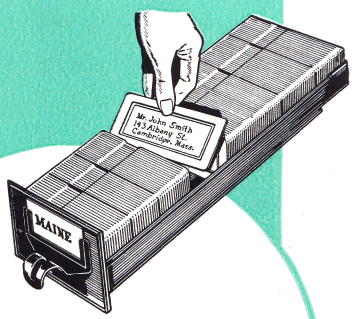
Elliott Model 3000 Senior

can be made to print, address, and chop off forms from an endless roll of blank paper. Here are 2 of these endless roll machines . . .

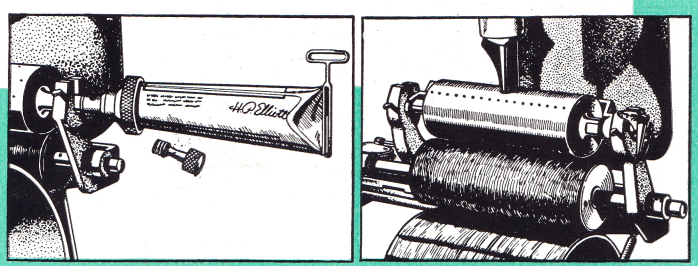
How the Model 3000 Senior receives and uses ink . . .



Note how the inked rubber roll and flat metal anvil of an Elliott Addressing Machine squeeze an address card and envelope together (as in a vise) so that the ink from the surface of the rubber roller will pass through the stenciled characters to print an address.



It is impossible for ink to get on the frames of Elliott Address Cards and because Elliott Address Cards are always handled by their frames, an operator's hands are kept clean.



Note how ink is squeezed from the ink tube into the Elliott Addressing Machine ink reservoir. An Elliott operator never touches ink or ink ribbons.

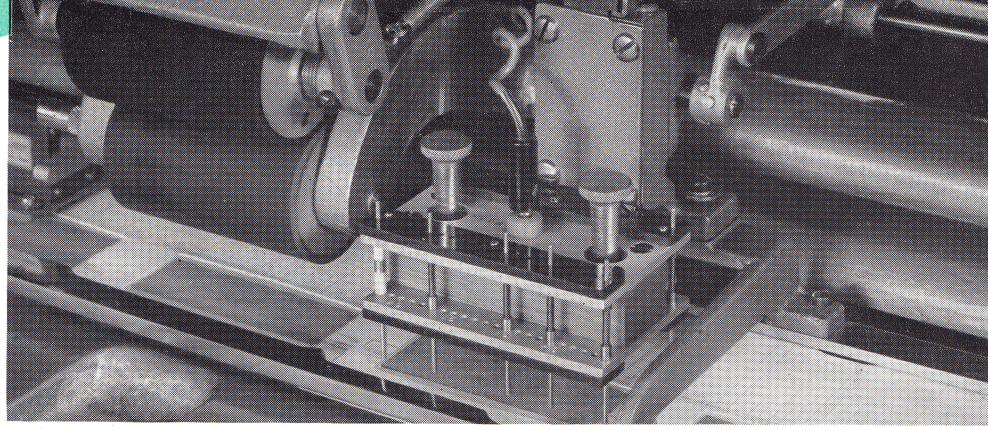
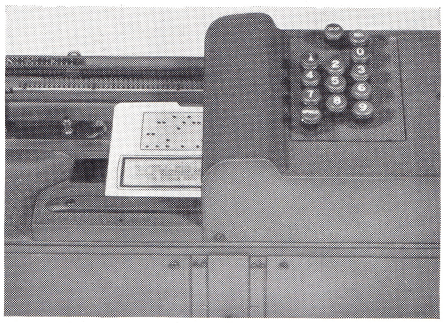
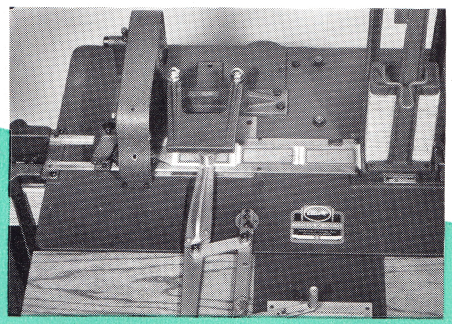
Automatic Addressing Selector Attachment

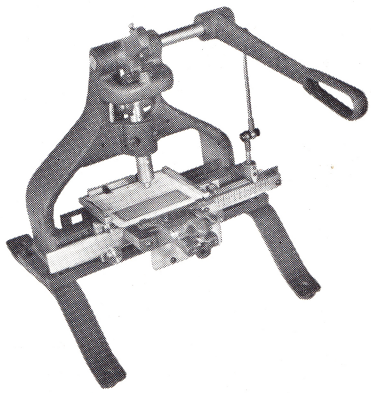


On their way to addressing position, Elliott address stencils pass through this address selector where pins are preset in one or many address classification positions, which can denote sex, rating, type of business and many other things.

This address-selecting attachment will skip all address stencils where classification holes do not exactly correspond to the positions of the preset pins. Thus, any desired group of addresses can be addressed, and any unwanted addresses can be automatically skipped.







The classification holes are punched in the frames of the address stencils by your choice of 8 different punching mechanisms . . . 3 of which are shown here.

Double and Triple Addressing Heads

The Elliott Model 3000 Senior can be equipped with double and triple addressing heads so that duplicate and triplicate addresses can be printed without using carbon paper.

Another use of double addressing heads is for tax roll sheets, where the owner's address and property description may be listed side by side in adjacent columns simultaneously as shown at left.
